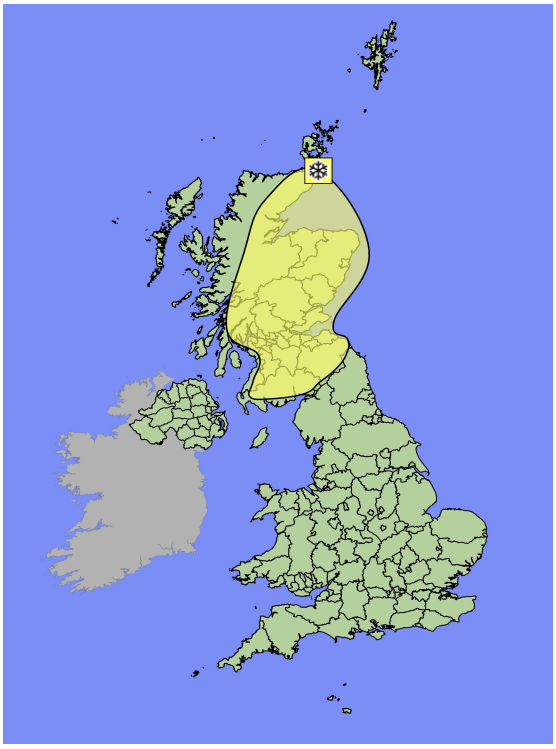
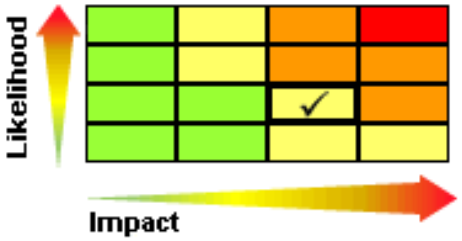
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A deep depression will track east close to northern Scotland during Monday. Westerly gales will be accompanied by wintry showers: the air is unusually cold for a westerly outbreak, being sourced from Canada a day or so earlier. Even so, the long track across the Atlantic seems likely to warm the lowest layers, such that disruptive snow will be mostly found away from western coasts, although there are some uncertainties attached to the amounts and distribution elsewhere.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow

Valid from 03:00 on Mon, 04th Feb 2013 until 23:59 on Mon, 04th Feb 2013

Heavy, squally wintry showers will affect many parts of Scotland through much of Monday. These will probably fall largely as sleet and hail along some western coasts, but will readily turn to snow inland and at any elevation. 10 to 20 cm of snow may affect higher level routes, with drifting and temporary blizzard conditions, while further up in the mountains, conditions will be atrocious. At lower levels, amounts of snowfall will be more variable but the worst affected areas could see 5 to 10 cm of snowfall, with some drifting. Winds will gust to 50 or 60 mph near the heavier showers but considerably higher over mountains.

The public should be aware of the potential for disruption, especially to travel.
